

How to Not be Bitter

Step 1: Do Not Express Your Emotions in Any Way.

You must not let the others read your face or your body language or the pain in your voice. Imagine you are in the most intense poker game of your life, sweat dripping from your forehead onto the pair of aces in your hands. The aces in this scenario are the deep resentment you've been hoarding, or the anger and irritation you feel when that one person does that one thing that THEY KNOW drives you absolutely mad. But can never let them know you feel this way. It's not proper or polite to express negative emotions, you don't want to be labeled as a bitter girl do you?

Step 2: Act as Though Nothing has Happened.

To avoid being bitter, you must push the deep, blistering, gut-wrenching feelings you have toward the situation down into the abyss that is your soul. The strong pang in your heart whenever you see them, the automatic fist clenching that occurs as a sight of anxiousness, the tears that form in your eyes when they pass you in the hallways as if they hadn't broken you into pieces, none of it matters. You must be the "bigger person", and avoid the matter at all costs. You don't want to be labeled as a bitter girl do you?

Step 3, the final and most important: Always Keep a Smile.

A smile means you are kind and invincible. A smile means that you are okay. It doesn't matter if you are not okay on the inside, as long as the outside is pretty and presentable and everyone else thinks that you're okay, you are okay. A smile is the pretty bow atop of the carefully curated disguise. A straight lip screams pain and anger. That is bitterness. A smile says "I'm friendly", "I'm fine", "Nothing can harm me".

Don't let them label you as a bitter girl.
